CASPER presents

NOTHING TO DO

Poor Sidney was born with no instinct. This might not have been too serious if he had been an intelligent animal, but he wasn't. And that left him nowhere.

All the other animals and birds and insects of the forest had their instinct (and in some cases a certain amount of intelligence) to tell them what time to get up in the morning, where to get their food, where to live, what to say to their wives, etc., etc. But poor Sidney just wandered around in a daze, eating when he happened to see something in front of him, sleeping wherever he happened to be when it got dark. Luckily he was an unappetizing looking little animal, and none of the predatory animals thought much of him as a meal.

He felt something was missing from his life. Wherever he looked he saw the other creatures doing definite things with definite goals in mind. He watched the blue jays building a nest and wondered about it.

"What are you doing?" he asked, simply.

"Go about your business!" snapped the male jay.

"I have no business," said Sidney. "I only wish I had something to do. Can I help you?"

"We don't need any help from nit-wits!" said the jay cruelly, and Sidney went away.

He watched the beavers working on a dam and asked them why they did it. The head beaver glared at him. "Because that's what beavers do!" he said. "Why do you do what you do?" Sidney shrugged. "I don't do anything. Can I help you?" he asked.

"We have no need of help from lazy do-nothings!" growled the beaver, and Sidney walked away.

Then he saw a bear scooping honey out of a tree. "Can I help you, Mr. Bear?" he said politely.

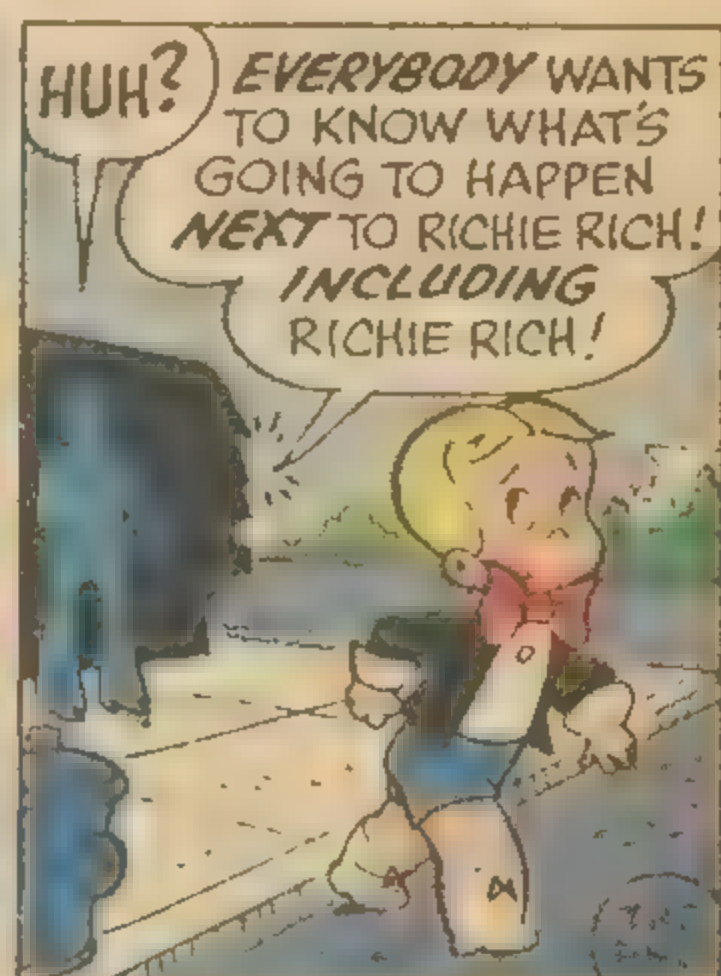

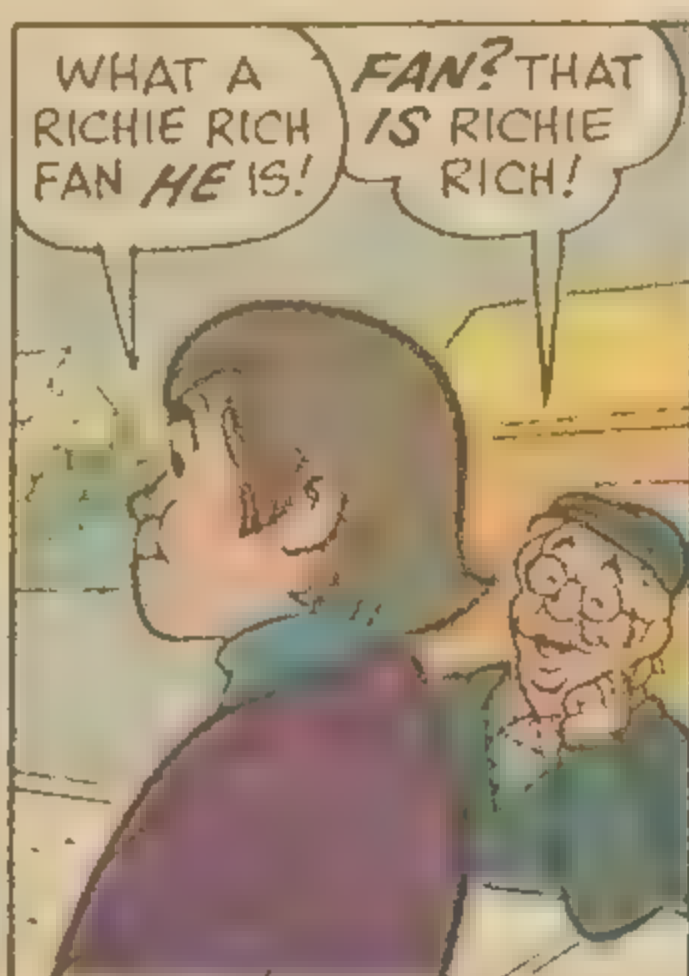

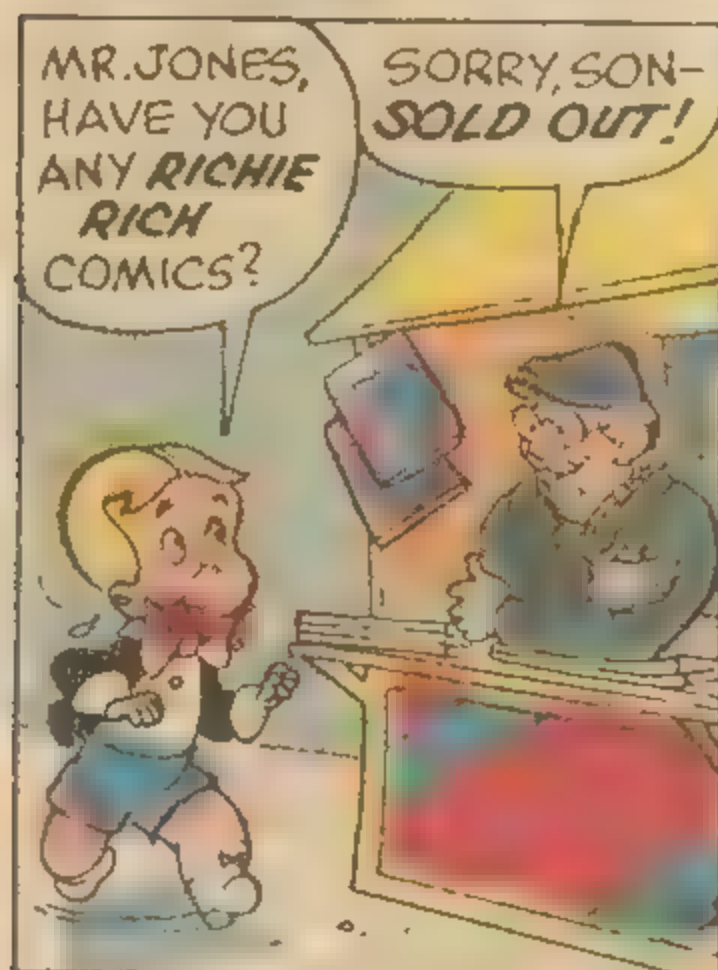

"What?" roared the bear. "There's barely enough for me! And you want me to share my honey after all the trouble I went to find it?"

"That's not what I meant," said Sidney. "I'm just looking for something to do. See, I could help you scoop out the honey like this, and you could eat it all." He reached into the tree trunk and lightly touched the honey. The bear roared with rage.

"Keep your paws off my honey!" the bear shouted and clouted Sidney in the ear. "If you want something to do, go hang upside down and sleep and stop annoying everybody!"

And that's what Sidney did, and to this day that's what all possums do.

RICHIE RICH

WENDY presents The PELICAN and the CROW

Petey Pelican blinked his round, innocent eyes.

"Well?" said Charlie Crow. "Didn't you hear me? I offered to teach you a trade!"

"I appreciate it, Charlie, really I do," said Petey, "But I sort of have a trade, almost . . . I'm going to be a fisherman like my daddy!"

"FISH!" snorted the crow. "Anybody can fish! Don't be a fool, Petey!"

Petey Pelican's eyes lit up with ambition. "All right!" he said. "Teach me!"

Charlie Crow grinned with delight. "Just follow me," he said, and flew off. Petey followed. Charlie flew high over the woods and began to circle a little clearing next to a big, red-roofed house, and Petey circled right behind him. Charlie landed high in a big tree and motioned Petey to sit beside him. He pointed down toward the clearing.

"Do you see that bird feeder down there?" Charlie asked. Petey nodded. "Well, just sit quietly now till twilight," Charlie said.

The two birds sat and watched as hundreds of other birds sailed in toward the feeder and paused to snatch a quick bite before sailing off again. Eat as they could, the birds swooping in couldn't carry off enough seeds in their little bellies to empty the supply. Charlie stared at the reserve of sunflower seeds, oats, barley and other wonderful tidbits and his eyes gleamed.

When the sun was low on the horizon, the other birds went home to their nests. Charlie motioned Petey to follow and swooped down on the feeder.

"You keep your big bill open right here," said Charlie, "And I'll scoop all these seeds into it! Then we'll fly back to my nest with the loot!"

Petey followed instructions blindly, and soon the contents of the bird feeder were transferred to his ample bill. Then he followed Charlie as the crow headed triumphantly toward his own nest.

"Dump the seeds here!" crowed Charlie. "We have enough seeds to last us a week!"

Just then a blue jay that had followed them from the feeder swooped low, screaming, "Thief! Thief!"

Petey stopped, suddenly shocked. "Is that the trade you've taught me?" he mumbled from his tightly closed bill, "To be a THIEF?"

"Don't listen to that jealous jay!" soothed Charlie. "I've taught you to be an opportunist! To see an opportunity and seize it!"

Petey thought hard for a minute. Then he suddenly gulped and all the seeds were gone!

"What are you doing?" screamed Charlie.

"Seizing my opportunity!" said Petey. "And now that I've mastered this trade I think I'll go back to fishing!"
